Case Study (Scenario) Unit #2:

For the past few weeks, I have become increasingly frustrated with one of my students. I'll call him Tom. Tom has fought more times that I can count. He is failing every class (I think). Tom is dragging down 4-5 other boys in my homeroom, who were once good, and now are also fighting and failing. We have called his mom, emailed his mom, assigned him a mentor (the Principal), enrolled him in a conflict resolution program. I've tried taking him aside to talk with him, and correcting him in front of his fellow students. Nothing seems to work. Yesterday he swore at a student and said he was going to bash him. I sent him to his mentor, then today, he came in late and proceeded to lift up a girl's shirt (in the back, Thank God). I don't know of anything else we can do. He kept saying today as I wrote him up that all I wanted to do was write him up. Not true, he just always seems to do something bad all of the time. What do I do? Well, eventually we all are going to run across or into a student like Tom! He does not respond to usual or traditional behavior modification. Suggest a couple of strategies for Tom that has not been used! Also, suggest a couple of strategies for the teacher to try that might help mend fences between them.
